

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Thanks to Michael Barratt Brown, Dick Barry, Tony Benn, John Boyd, Alex Callinicos, Noam Chomsky, Ken Coates, John Eatwell, John Edmonds, Dafydd Elis-Thomas, Larry Elliott, John Fisher, Mark Fisher, Bryan Gould, Robert Griffiths, Paul Hardiman, Stuart Holland, Kelvin Hopkins, Jack Jones, Marc Jones, Hugh Kerr, Neil Kinnock, Jean Lambert, Caroline Lucas, Paul Marsh, John Mills, Austin Mitchell, Craig Milroy, John Monks, Bernie Moss, Susan Murray, Tom Nairn, David Owen, Robin Ramsay, Peter Robinson, Regan Scott, Mark Seddon, Ken Smith, David Stoddart, Hilary Wainwright, John Williams, Shirley Williams, Ernest Wistrich, and Robert Worcester for participating in this research.

Thanks to staff at the Gaitskell Papers archive (University College London), the Green Party archive (University of Teeside), the Labour History Museum archive, the Marx Memorial Library, the Plaid Cymru archive (National Library of Wales), the Social Democratic Party archive (University of Essex), the Scottish National Party archive (National Library of Scotland), and the Trade Union Congress archive (University of North London).

Special thanks to Dr Brian Burkitt, my supervisor, for all his encouragement and support.

Tony Benn (1998) once said that ‘the people who are remembered are the teachers. Many people go through life with a little torch illuminating their feet, but the teacher sends up a pyrotechnic which, just for a second, illuminates the whole landscape.’ This thesis is dedicated to Tony Benn and Noam Chomsky, two people who have lit up the landscape and, by so doing, have profoundly influenced my intellectual and political development.